

Hancock

Hancock is a summer blockbuster starring Will Smith as a depressed drunk who just happens to have superpowers, which he uses to “save” the city, although he usually racks up a considerable damage toll. However after he meets a man in the PR business named Ray Embry who is committed to changing the world, Hancock agrees to go to prison in hopes of being accepted by the public that hates him due to his destructive antics. In fact Nancy Gray lends herself to the film in a hilarious rant against Hancock. While in jail we see Hancock develop into a better person through a mix of serious and comedic scenes. As a viewer the movie up until he leaves prison will probably be your favorite part. After the public realizes that Hancock is the key to keeping crime rates low the police chief calls for Hancock to be released to assist with a bank job. After stopping the robbery in a great laugh out loud way we realize that Hancock is destined to be a superhero. After that the movie takes a huge twist but I’m going to let you find out what that twist is.

What I thought

Hancock is like most Will Smith movies, especially Bad Boys II, they are alike because they both start as funny actions with a slight hint that it is about to get serious. Like dancing with a girl you were pressured into asking. Then once you think it is all better the movie takes a twist you don’t see coming (like Sid being kidnapped in BB2). The critics didn’t like the twist but most normal people who don’t analyze the story will find the twist quite awesome. Just to give you a hint the twist involves shifting from light-hearted to a drama. Over all I liked the movie. In fact I think most of what made the movie was the cast. Will Smith is the misunderstood, confused guy with an “I don’t care attitude” who eventually realizes his calling as a hero. I honestly believe that no one but Smith could’ve pulled this off well. Next we have Jason Bateman who does a great job as Hancock’s true believer who is able to turn the down & out into a hero. Finally we have Charlize Theron who is the hott wife of Ray and for some reason tries to drive Hancock away and is the source of the twist(wink). This movie is an all around fun one armed to the teeth with an arsenal of jokes and action scenes that would keep Evel Knievel watching in silence.

Bottom line

Take a date.
